The first two studies were designed to test the hypothesis that the presence of a social partner would increase the number of vocalizations produced by infants. In both studies, the mean number of vocalizations per minute was significantly higher during the interaction condition than during the baseline condition ( $p < .001$ ). The mean number of vocalizations per minute was also significantly higher during the interaction condition than during the control condition ( $p < .001$ ) in both studies.
